America's Favorite Pastime

Todd Snider

Dock Ellis didn't think he was pitching that day Back in 1970

When he and his wife took a trip to the ballpark
A little bit differentlySo by the time that he hit the bullpen
Half the world had melted away

That's about the time coach Murtaugh came and said

Dock you're pitching today Taking the mound the ground turned into

The icing on a birthday cake

The lead off man came up and turned into
A dancing rattle snakeThe crowd tracked back and forth
In waves of color underneath the sun

That ball turned into a silver bullet

His arm into a gun I took a look all around the world one time

I finally discovered

You can't judge a bookThree up, three down for three straight innings In a zero, zero tie

As all those batters names come ringing
From a voice out of the skyHallucinating Halloween scenes
Each new swing of the bat

His sinker looked like it was falling off a table
But nobody was hallucinating thatI took a look all around the world one time
I finally discovered

You can't judge a bookBy the top of the seventh he was up one to nothing

And giving them padres fits

By the bottom of the eighth he was up two to nothing

And they still hadn't got any hits
With one out left to go in the game
The batter looked like a baby child
That birthday cake was shaking

Them waves of color was going wildBy the time that he mowed the last man down He was high as he had ever been

Laughing to the sounds of the world going around

Completely unaware of the winAnd while the papers would say he was scattered that day

He was pretty as a pitcher could be

The day Dock Ellis of the Pittsburgh Pirates
Threw a no hitter on LSDI took a look all around the world one time
I finally discovered
You can't judge a book
